EN have different characteristic ways of acquiring wisdom through experience. Corse Payton s method has been the lightning express kind which bangs impetuously ahead until it smashes into something standing in the way to success. He pulls himself out of the ruins, and, for a while, views that something with a dazed quizzical surprise. He does not nurse his bruises for long, however. Soon he recovers his accustomed confidence and, climbing nimbly over the impediment, gets up steam again for another quick run. The next time, though, that he makes that same run he does not do any smashing. No, he puts on the brakes and stops before getting hurt, for he has learned the dangerous places along that line. Never was he known to ask advice. The people who are always asking advice are not the ones who do things. Such people spend their time figuring how a thing ought to be done, and if they ever get around to do it some one is ahead of them and taking up all the road. Corse Payton s motto is get the road first. Not allowing himself, therefore, to be confused with conflicting advice, he has stamped all of his enterprises with his own originality. Now, originality being the commodity the world most wants, he has, of course, succeeded. Very early in life did this impetuous energy of his make itself felt. When only a wee chap...
